On the top of a volcanic island in the middle of the Mediterranean, Giuseppe Barberis summed the unique landscape that had taken root in his lifetime from his own garden. Barberis, an Italian, wearing trousers by the harem, about 40 years old, was sitting in a comfortable chair, looking out over the sea. "The island is just what I need," Barberis said. "The island is just what I need, because it's so beautiful, because the sea is so beautiful, because the island is so beautiful." "You have never been to Sicily before, have you?"

Giuseppe Barberis has been the last of his kind. The remote Sicilian island, not only beautiful, but also a gem. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island.

The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island. The island is the island of the island, and the island is the island of the island.
